Introducing malleable cast iron by Dandong Foundry in China, including its definition, properties, production, main products and difference with gray iron, ductile. Malleable cast iron is a heat-treated iron-carbon alloy, which solidifies in the as-cast condition with a graphite-free structure, i.e. the total carbon content is present in the cementite form ( $Fe_3C$ ).

Malleable iron and cast iron (also known as gray cast iron) are two such alloys. Major differences between these two metals include their. Iron-carbon casting alloy which is standardized in DIN EN A distinction is made between whiteheart malleable cast iron and blackheart malleable cast iron . Malleable cast iron is an iron alloy containing a small percentage of carbon ( typically between 2 and 4 percent). The material is formed when cast iron is heated. This chapter deals with malleable irons, which are cast white, that is, their as-cast structure consists of metastable carbide in a pearlitic matrix. The castings must.

Malleable cast iron is produced from a close to white iron matrix, which is then heat treated in two steps, producing a ferrite+perlite+tempered carbon structure.
